The European Union’s top diplomat stated on Saturday that mediators were close to completing a global arrangement on Iran’s nuclear program.

“Now we are extremely close to a contract and I hope it will be possible,” EU foreign policy chief Josep Borrell stated in a speech to the Doha Forum in Qatar, according to Reuters.

Borrell’s remarks come amidst stalled development towards a offer, which would see the Obama administration's 2015 Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action restored. Russian mediators required earlier this month that any trade inbetween Russia and Iran be exempt from financial sanctions enforced over the intrusion of Ukraine, thwarting settlements.

The EU's organizer for settlements, Enrique Mora, composed on Twitter on Friday that he is heading to Tehran to continue talks with Iran's head mediator, Ali Bagheri Kani.

"Travelling to Tehran tomorrow to fulfill [Bagheri Kani]," Mora composed. "Working on closing the staying spaces in the #ViennaTalks on the #JCPOA. We needto conclude this settlement. Much is at stake."

One of the last concerns to be dealtwith priorto reimplementing the JCPOA is the status of the Iran Revolutionary Guard Corps, an elite Iranian force which the U.S. presently designates as a terrorist company. Negotiators are thinkingabout whether to eliminate that classification, the Wall Street Journal reported earlier this week.

Iran's foreign minister Hossein Amirabdollahian stated the problem of U.S. sanctions on the IRGC was a primary sticking point in settlements, in remarks to state TELEVISION on Saturday.

White House press secretary Jen Psaki stated on Monday that the Biden administration's choice to return to the Iran offer would be based on the "best interests" of U.S. security.

"We puton't have a offer yet, we're consulting with our allies and partners, consistingof Israel, as we workout, and the president is going to make a choice on whether to reenter the offer based on what's in the finest interests of American security and tactical interests," Psaki informed pressreporters.
